The Challenges of State Policing in Kenya

Kenneth Omeje & John Mwangi Githigaro

Abstract

This paper is concerned with the challenges and dynamics of state policing in contemporary Kenya. The popular transition to multi-party democracy in Kenya in 2002 came with a great hope and expectation of reforms in the political, economic, and security spaces. In particular, it was envisaged that reform in the security sector would, among other things, end the dismal paradigm of policing for regime security and replace it with a new dispensation of popular policing oriented to the general protection and security of the citizens. For about eight years into the new multi-party republic, the Kenyan police force was hardly reformed. The outbreak of the infamous post-election violence of early 2008 with its horrifying incidents of ethnic massacre and police incapacity and brutality graphically reported by the international media served as a reminder to security specialists and observers alike that the Kenyan security sector crisis, which reached a crescendo during the dictatorship of Daniel Arap Moi, is far from over. This study analyzes the transition from state policing to multi-choice policing in Kenya, including its underlying structural and empirical impediments, externalities, challenges, and opportunities.

Introduction

This study investigates and analyzes the problems and challenges encountered by the Kenyan Police Force in their function of delivering effective policing services as required by law and expected by the public. The KPF has evolved from a pro-imperial colonial police (founded to subjugate the colonized ‘native populations’) to what it is today. Originally formed as a colonial constabulary, the institution was not created as a people’s police, but as a reactionary instrument of conquest and repression with the aim of achieving the imperial objectives of resource extraction and political domination. This peculiar history of pro-imperialist coercion and anti-locals disposition is what preponderantly shaped the institutional character and operations of most African police forces, including the KPF. It is in this historical context that one can properly understand the role of KPF in the crackdown of the anti-colonial struggle and brutalization of activists in the nationalist movements for independence, such as the famous Mau Mau freedom fighters. One of the greatest but rarely appreciated challenges of independence in Kenya and Africa was the need to transform the inherited colonial police force from an anti-people to a legitimate national police protective of, and owned by the people.

Sadly, the necessary transformative reform of the police force has been mostly elusive in the majority of the post-colonial states of Africa, not least in Kenya. Evidence from the 24 years of President Daniel Arap Moi’s regime reveal that the KPF was instrumental to a catalogue of human rights violations, including politically motivated disappearances and targeted killing of many perceived opponents. Many leading pro-democracy activists that campaigned for the expansion of the political space were repeatedly harassed and brutalized by the KPF. Unlawful and prolonged detention of opponents without trial was rampant. The media houses were not spared as a number of critical private media were banned. Also, owing to the prolonged undemocratic rule by President Moi, the police institution became highly politicized with the result that recruitment and promotion of officers were for the most part based on cronynism and clannism. The police was seemingly dominated by hegemonic ethnic groups. Corruption became widespread even as violent crime soared. The 1990s witnessed an astronomically high crime rate, especially in the Nairobi area. The image and reputation of the police was at its lowest ebb in the post-independence history. Moi presided over a highly regimented one party state largely sustained by an unprofessional police force that many critics likened to the Gestapo (secret state police) of the defunct Nazi Germany.

The return to popular democracy in 2002 following the election of President Mwai Kibaki came with rekindled hope and great expectation in the security sector that KPF would among other things be reformed and professionalized to be able to deliver efficient and productive policing. A number of progressive steps seemed to have been made since 2002 such as the emergence of preventive action through community policing of various neighborhoods. Community policing, which is the main plank of state policing service in Kenya and many modern democracies worldwide, is literally a bottom–up approach that aims at policing in partnership and with the consent of the people. Community policing adopts various strategies to build trust and partnership with the policed including reaching out to community stakeholders to ascertain their needs, public involvement in intelligence and neighborhood surveillance, the creation of police posts and liaison offices within short intervals in residential neighborhoods, sensitization of the public to the needs, difficulties and challenges of the police with a view to eliciting understanding and sundry supportive actions, etc. Since it was introduced in Nairobi under the Kibaki regime, community policing has been extended to Supportive actions, etc. Since it was introduced in Nairobi under the Kibaki regime, community policing has been extended to sensitization of the public to the needs, difficulties and challenges of the police with a view to eliciting understanding and sundry neighborhood surveillance, the creation of police posts and liaison offices within short intervals in residential neighborhoods, policed including reaching out to community stakeholders to ascertain their needs, public involvement in intelligence and partnership and with the consent of the people. Community policing adopts various strategies to build trust and partnership with the policing service in Kenya and many modern democracies worldwide, is literally a bottom–up approach that aims at policing in preventive action through community policing of various neighborhoods. Community policing, which is the main plank of state efficient and productive policing. A number of progressive steps seemed to have been made since 2002 such as the emergence of expectation in the security sector that KPF would among other things be reformed and professionalized to be able to deliver
The return to popular democracy in 2002 following the election of President Mwai Kibaki came with rekindled hope and great Gestapo (secret state police) of the defunct Nazi Germany.

Corruption became widespread even as violent crime soared. The 1990s witnessed an astronomically high crime rate, especially in were for the most part based on cronyism and clannism. The police was seemingly dominated by hegemonic ethnic groups.
media houses were not spared as a number of critical private media were banned.
repeatedly harassed and brutalized by the KPF. Unlawful and prolonged detention of opponents without trial was rampant. The perceived opponents. Many leading pro-democracy activists that campaigned for the expansion of the political space were instrumental to a catalogue of human rights violations, including politically motivated disappearances and targeted killing of many Africa, not least in Kenya. Evidence from the 24 years of President Daniel Arap Moi's regime reveal that the KPF was Sadly, the necessary transformative reform of the police force has been mostly elusive in the majority of the post-colonial states of Mau freedom fighters.

One of the greatest but rarely appreciated challenges of independence in Kenya and Africa was the need media and coercion and anti-locals disposition is what preponderantly shaped the institutional character and operations of most African police constabulary, the institution was not created as a people's police, but as a reactionary instrument of conquest and repression with colonial police (founded to subjugate the colonized 'native populations') to what it is today. Originally formed as a colonial
This study investigates and analyzes the problems and challenges encountered by the Kenyan Police Force in their function of multi-choice policing in Kenya, including its underlying structural and empirical impediments, externalities, dictatorship of Daniel Arap Moi, is far from over. This study analyzes the transition from state policing to specialists and observers alike that the Kenyan security sector crisis, which reached a crescendo during the incapacity and brutality graphically reported by the international media served as a reminder to security years into the new multi-party republic, the Kenyan police force was hardly reformed. The outbreak of the transition to multi-party democracy in Kenya in 2002 came with a great hope and expectation of reforms in the
This paper is concerned with the challenges and dynamics of state policing in contemporary Kenya. The popular
Kenneth Omeje & John Mwangi Githigaro

Peace & Conflict Review
Volume 7, Issue 1
ISSN: 1659-3995
Peace and Conflict Review · Volume 7 Issue 1 · Year 2012 · Page 2
various parts of the country. Ostensibly, there has not been independent impact evaluation of progress made and problems and challenges encountered in community policing in Kenya. [5] This practical gap in research becomes more compelling against the evidence of growing crime rates, coupled with allegations by many local and international NGOs and human rights watchdogs that KPF perpetrates egregious human rights violations with impunity. Hence, even though the return to multi-partyism in the post-Moi era created a great opportunity for reforms and transformation, this seems to have rapidly slipped away as evidenced during the 2008 post-election violence. The incapacity of the KPF was palpable during the violence as they seemed overwhelmed and unprepared to tackle the situation. [6] This project is therefore a significant inquiry that investigates the capacity deficits and challenges of the KPF.

From a Weberian perspective, the Kenyan state does not have the monopoly of the legitimate use of force required to maintain law and order, as well as to guarantee internal and external sovereignty in a modern state. One of the hallmarks of state sovereignty in the contemporary international system is the ability to guarantee the security of its citizens and territory. [7] The concept of state security is both fuzzy and problematic, and more so in Africa given the historical diversity of states as political units with a considerable proportion of them derogating from the Westphalian benchmark. There exist multiple networks of power within and beyond the geo-spatial state boundaries in many African countries with the result that some of the African states have been differently described as weak states, quasi-states, fragile states, pseudo states and shadow states. [8] From available empirical indicators, the Kenyan state ostensibly fits into the mould of states in Africa categorized as weak or fragile, given the fragmented nature of policing and security domains in the country. Apparently, the Kenyan state, like many in Africa and elsewhere in the developing regions, can scarcely guarantee security for its citizenry.

New security governance models seem to be taking shape in Kenya. At the heart of the new security governance architecture is a plethora of self help efforts and the privatization of state security. This emerging security architecture, which seems to be the trend in many parts of the developing world, has been conceptualized as multi-choice policing, [9] which includes a mixed bag of both functionally responsible public and private security providers on the one hand, and a subterranean network of uncivil and dysfunctional groups that provide alternative but too often menacing security. Some of the alternative security providers that pose threats to state security in Kenya include militia and vigilante groups that have partly emerged in response to the apparent incapacity and failings of the Kenyan state. The re-introduction of multi-partyism in 1991 brought with it the dissolution of the state monopoly of violence by heralding the emergence of ethnic militias. These militias were consequently mobilized as forms of extra-state violence. With time, these militias assumed a life of their own and the Kenyan state could no longer control them. [10] It has been observed that the Kenyan militia groups are in many instances filling a security vacuum left by the state. But in reality, the diffuse security arrangements constitute a threat to the KPF that has the sole mandate of maintaining law and order as is typical of state policing agencies elsewhere. The KPF officials interviewed for this study claim that the underlying challenges of state policing in Kenya have to do with the growing incapacity of the state to provide the necessary infrastructure for policing, such as operational equipment and facilities. The magnitude and intensity of “structural violence” [11] in the Kenyan society have also aggravated the propensity of criminal and organized violence in the country, and by corollary, the policing challenges.

Our empirical findings suggest that poverty levels have a correlation with increased crime in Kenya. In the study, we came across narratives suggesting that the breakdown of social order predisposes the youth to crime, and this tends to be in line with major sociological discourses of violence, such as the social control theory in criminology. The underlying assumption of social control theory is that individuals are potential law violators, and it is primary social bonds such as family and friends that keep them in control. Without such supportive social bonds, theorists argue, many vulnerable folks, especially (but not exclusively) those on the margins of society, become prone to criminality and deviant behaviour. [12] Hence, from this sociological perspective, criminality in the society is linked to the weakening of ties that bind people to the supportive networks that hold the society together. The correlated links between poverty and crime mentioned above is a trend supported by the apparent shift from conventional security paradigm (national security, national interests and military power) to human security, a shift which in the post-Cold War international order seems to have justifiably taken center-stage in national security strategies, especially among developing countries. [13] The human security debate was advanced by the 1994 UNDP Human Development Report that defined human security in terms of freedoms. Freedom from fear (of violence and conflict) and freedom from want (hunger and deprivation) is a simplified way of capturing human security. [14] In Africa, non-military dimensions of security, such as environmental degradation, poverty, resource scarcity, and so forth threaten both societal security and national security. [15] Human security concerns are thus among the contemporary challenges to the provision of state security by KPF.

Methodological Imperatives

This study is based on qualitative methods of data collection and analysis. The study made use of both primary and secondary data. With regard to secondary data, the following types of data were collected: official statistics and information about the rate, diversity and the nature of crime in Kenya; budgetary allocation to the police force - how it is disbursed and utilized, as well as the general information about the dynamics of security and law enforcement in Africa. All secondary data and information were sourced from academic and policy literature (especially, books and journals); and publications of governments, international organizations and civil societies.

Regarding primary data, this study adopted the use of semi-structured interview method of data collection for the police, civil organizations and civil societies. Sourced from academic and policy literature (especially, books and journals); and publications of governments, international organisations and local communities. All secondary data and information were gathered through a careful examination of the literature. This study is based on qualitative methods of data collection and analysis. The study made use of both primary and secondary data.

Methodological Imperatives

Poverty, resource scarcity, and so forth threaten both societal security and national security. The traditional notion of security, focusing primarily on military aspects of national security, is inadequate for the current conditions. Human security concerns are thus being redefined to consider non-military dimensions of security, such as environmental degradation, health, education, and social justice. This conceptualization of security is more comprehensive and allows for a more holistic approach to addressing the challenges faced by contemporary states.

The concept of statehood in the contemporary international system is the ability to guarantee the security of its citizens and territory. From a Weberian perspective, the Kenyan state does not have the monopoly of the legitimate use of force required to maintain law and order, as well as to guarantee internal and external sovereignty in a modern state. One of the hallmarks of state sovereignty in the international system is the ability to guarantee the security of its citizens and territory. The Kenyan state is unprepared to tackle the situation.

With regard to secondary data, the following types of data were collected: official statistics and information about the rate, extent, and nature of crime and injury. This data was used to identify trends and patterns in criminal activity and its impact on the community. The magnitude and intensity of “structural violence” in the society is linked to the weakening of ties that bind people to the supportive networks that hold the society together. The margins of society, become prone to criminality and deviant behaviour.

Poverty and crime are correlated links between poverty and crime mentioned above is a trend supported by the apparent shift from conventional security to human security. The traditional focus on military security has been replaced by a more nuanced understanding of security that includes human security. The theory is that individuals are potential law violators, and it is primary social bonds such as family and friends that keep them in control. Without such supportive social bonds, theorists argue, many vulnerable folks, especially (but not exclusively) those on the margins of society, become prone to criminality and deviant behaviour.

Control. Without such supportive social bonds, theorists argue, many vulnerable folks, especially (but not exclusively) those on the margins of society, become prone to criminality and deviant behaviour. Our empirical findings suggest that poverty levels have a correlation with increased crime in Kenya. In the study, we came across narratives suggesting that the breakdown of social order predisposes the youth to crime, and this tends to be in line with major structural violence aggravating the propensity of criminal and organized violence in the country, and by corollary, the policing challenges.

The Kenya Police Force (KPF) is responsible for the enforcement of law and order. KPF performance is under scrutiny due to complaints of corruption, poor service delivery, and human rights violations. This study interviewed 54 KPF officers in 2007 and 2008. The incidents we examine include the re-introduction of multi-partyism in 1991, the emergence of ethnic militias, and the roles of the police in the political process. The KPF perpetrates egregious human rights violations with impunity. Hence, even though the return to multi-partyism in the post-Moi era created a great opportunity for reforms and transformation, this seems to have rapidly slipped away as evidenced during the 2007-2008 post-election violence. The incapacity of the KPF was palpable during the violence as they seemed overwhelmed and unprepared to tackle the situation.

The police have played a critical role in maintaining the stability and security of the country. They have been involved in various operations, including maintaining order during protests and managing crowd control during meetings. The police have also conducted patrols and provided security in various public spaces. The police have also been involved in various community policing initiatives, including the establishment of community policing units in various areas. The police have also been involved in various activities aimed at building trust with the community, including attending community meetings and participating in community events. The police have also been responsible for maintaining law and order in various events, including political meetings, protests, and cultural events. The police have also been involved in various activities aimed at building trust with the community, including attending community meetings and participating in community events. The police have also been responsible for maintaining law and order in various events, including political meetings, protests, and cultural events.

In many parts of the developing world, has been conceptualized as multi-choice policing, a plethora of self help efforts and the privatization of state security. This emerging security architecture, which seems to be the trend in many parts of the developing world, can scarcely guarantee security for it citizenry. Dealing with the challenges of the KPF.

The concept of statehood in the contemporary international system is the ability to guarantee the security of its citizens and territory. There exist multiple networks of power within and beyond the geo-spatial state boundaries in many African countries with the result that some of the African states have been considered weak states, quasi-states, fragile states, pseudo states and shadow states. Security is both fuzzy and problematic, and more so in Africa given the historical diversity of states as political units with a nature of policing and security domains in the country. Apparently, the Kenyan state, like many in Africa and elsewhere in the developing regions, can scarcely guarantee security for it citizenry.
society, and specific catchments of the public. Choice of study locations and selection of respondents were based on a simple non-probability method of purposive sampling, implying that territorial locations and fieldwork respondents were selected on the basis of their considered relevance to the study, as well as the logistical convenience of the researchers. Primary data collection was done in Nairobi and Nakuru in the Rift Valley between October 2010 and March 2011.

The project interviewed police officers of various ranks from the two fieldwork locations. The researchers specifically targeted to interview officers that worked in the police headquarters where crimes are recorded and investigations instituted, as well as those that were deployed to potential tinderbox areas inhabited by low income people where there are high levels of unemployed youth, social deprivation, poverty-related crimes and recurrent offenders, including large sections of people who are easily mobilizable for political violence. The study interviewed 41 police officers of various ranks drawn more or less proportionately from the two study areas. With regard to civil society, the study interviewed 13 key officers of 10 different human rights and security sector NGOs based in the 2 project locations and 40 members of the public purposively drawn from the high density, potentially violent–prone residential communities. The two field study locations were chosen because they are notorious for high levels of crime based on the annual crime statistics for recent years. Secondly, the two cities were among the most affected by the post-election violence of 2008. Empirical data was analyzed interpretively using relevant conceptual themes.

A Brief Summary of Factors that Account for Insecurity in Kenya

Fieldwork interviews with police officers of various ranks, civil society and grassroots citizens indicate that a multiplicity of factors account for insecurity in the country. The factors mentioned by respondents include unemployment among the youth, poverty, police collusion with criminals, drugs and peer influence, the growth of vigilantes and ethnic militias, corruption and political machinations in the police force, collapse of the family institution, the proliferation of small arms and light weapons attributed to conflicts in the Horn of Africa and the Great Lakes Region, etc. Below is a typology of crimes handled by the Kenyan police developed from our fieldwork.
society, and specific catchments of the public. Choice of study locations and selection of respondents were based on a simple non-probability method of purposive sampling, implying that territorial locations and fieldwork respondents were selected on the basis of their considered relevance to the study, as well as the logistical convenience of the researchers. Primary data collection was done in Nairobi and Nakuru in the Rift Valley between October 2010 and March 2011.

The project interviewed police officers of various ranks from the two fieldwork locations. The researchers specifically targeted to interview officers that worked in the police headquarters where crimes are recorded and investigations instituted, as well as those that were deployed to potential tinderbox areas inhabited by low income people where there are high levels of unemployed youth, social deprivation, poverty-related crimes and recurrent offenders, including large sections of people who are easily mobilizable for political violence. The study interviewed 41 police officers of various ranks drawn more or less proportionately from the two study areas. With regard to civil society, the study interviewed 13 key officers of 10 different human rights and security sector NGOs based in the 2 project locations and 40 members of the public purposively drawn from the high density, potentially violent–prone residential communities. The two field study locations were chosen because they are notorious for high levels of crime based on the annual crime statistics for recent years. Secondly, the two cities were among the most affected by the post-election violence of 2008.

Empirical data was analyzed interpretively using relevant conceptual themes.

A Brief Summary of Factors that Account for Insecurity in Kenya

Fieldwork interviews with police officers of various ranks, civil society and grassroots citizens indicate that a multiplicity of factors account for insecurity in the country. The factors mentioned by respondents include unemployment among the youth, poverty, police collusion with criminals, drugs and peer influence, the growth of vigilantes and ethnic militias, corruption and political machinations in the police force, collapse of the family institution, the proliferation of small arms and light weapons attributed to conflicts in the Horn of Africa and the Great Lakes Region, etc. Below is a typology of crimes handled by the Kenyan police developed from our fieldwork.
Policing Challenges

From our fieldwork, the Kenyan police face several deficiencies that in varied ways hinder their effectiveness in implementing their broad mandate of maintaining law and order. This part looks at various challenges that the police force faces in the discharge of their duties.

Transport Deficiencies

Our fieldwork indicates that the Kenyan police are critically challenged with regard to transport facilities. The policing needs far outweigh the transport resources at their disposal. Whereas there are minimal vehicles to carry out their duties, the few available resources are poorly serviced and scarcely fuelled. The fieldwork team was informed by some of the police respondents that each police vehicle has a quota of 10 litres of fuel a day (i.e. every 24 hours) regardless of the jurisdiction. The lack of reliable transport means therefore that the police will be slow to respond to incidents of crime. Similarly, it also minimizes police presence in certain crucial localities, making it possible for criminals to have a field day. The police acknowledge that their mere presence in various localities is in itself deterrence to crime. The poorly serviced vehicles also mean that the police cannot match the speed and efficiency with which criminals often escape from crime scenes. The interviewed police officers therefore see a correlation between their response to crime and their transport infrastructure. As one officer noted:

In this station, we for instance have one vehicle. It looks like a ‘Mamba’ (Swahili for crocodile) because it is neglected; it is not serviced regularly and keeps breaking down so often. In a word, it is dysfunctional. Tell me then how is it possible to handle our responsibilities if transport is a challenge? It means that we may not respond adequately to crime issues.

---

Table: Typology of Crimes Handled by the Kenyan Police

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Typology</th>
<th>Manifestations</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1. Economic and Commercial Crimes</td>
<td>Banking fraud, money laundering, among others.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2. Transnational Crimes</td>
<td>Terrorism, cyber crimes, drugs trafficking, human trafficking, arms trafficking, illegal immigrants, money laundering.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>3. Gender-based Violence</td>
<td>Rape, defilement, sexual assaults.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>4. Traffic Offences</td>
<td>Accidents, breach of traffic rules and regulations.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>5. Organized Crimes</td>
<td>Lawless devices and activities of unlawful ethnic militias and vigilante groups (e.g. extortion of public service vehicles and people living in certain residential suburbs compelled to pay protection fees, instigating and prosecuting ethnic clashes, and indulgence in political thuggery at the behest of some local politicians).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>6. Resource Conflicts</td>
<td>Cattle rustling, conflicts over land and pastures, among others.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>8. Robbery, General Stealing and Kidnappings</td>
<td>Violent robbery, street mugging, car-jacking, etc.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Source: Fieldwork Interviews with Police Officers in Nairobi and Nakuru Fall 2010.
Policing Challenges

From our fieldwork, the Kenyan police face several deficiencies that in varied ways hinder their effectiveness in implementing their broad mandate of maintaining law and order. This part looks at various challenges that the police force faces in the discharge of their duties.

Transport Deficiencies

Our fieldwork indicates that the Kenyan police are critically challenged with regard to transport facilities. The policing needs far outweigh the transport resources at their disposal. Whereas there are minimal vehicles to carry out their duties, the few available resources are poorly serviced and scarcely fuelled. The fieldwork team was informed by some of the police respondents that each police vehicle has a quota of 10 litres of fuel a day (i.e. every 24 hours) regardless of the jurisdiction. The lack of reliable transport means therefore that the police will be slow to respond to incidents of crime. Similarly, it also minimizes police presence in certain crucial localities, making it possible for criminals to have a field day. The police acknowledge that their mere presence in various localities is in itself deterrence to crime. The poorly serviced vehicles also mean that the police cannot match the speed and efficiency with which criminals often escape from crime scenes. The interviewed police officers therefore see a correlation between their response to crime and their transport infrastructure. As one officer noted:

"In this station, we for instance have one vehicle. It looks like a 'Mamba' (Swahili for crocodile) because it is neglected; it is not serviced regularly and keeps breaking down so often. In a word, it is dysfunctional. Tell me then how is it possible to handle our responsibilities if transport is a challenge? It means that we may not respond adequately to crime issues."
Human Resource Capacity Deficits

The Kenyan police are understaffed and therefore the country is under policed. There are estimates that the Kenyan police have a total population of about 40,000 personnel (figures as at end of 2010). The public - policing ratio can be deduced therefore to be roughly in the ratio of 1:1000 going by the 2009 national population census figures of roughly 40 million citizens. This is far below the UN recommended police – public ratio of 1:450[17] But the Kenyan public – policing ration referenced above is only in theory. Our fieldwork data reveals that a quarter of the Kenyan police are engaged in office administration duties, guarding the political elites or serving as drivers to top government officials. Hence, the active number of police officers engaged in crime prevention and real public service is about 30,000 personnel. It is instructive that a staggering number of 2,500 officers are permanently deployed to the personal service and protection of top political office holders (President, Prime Minister, Vice President, Deputy Prime Minister, Cabinet Ministers, etc). The President and his family alone are guarded by 200 elite squad drawn from the general service unit; the Prime Minister and the Vice President each has 45 armed guards at their disposal[18] This lends credence to the view that post-colonial policing philosophy in Kenya has hardly been transformed. The KPF is still overly concerned with regime security as opposed to citizen security[19] One of the officers interviewed on the matter commented as follows[20]

[...] the police force needs some reorganizing of sorts in terms of deployment of officers. There are some non-essential services carried by the police that would be left out to other government departments. For example, police drivers assigned to top government officials would be more useful in general policing as opposed to their current duties.

There are still other factors that affect the capacity of the police. Natural attrition, physical injury, resignation for greener pastures elsewhere and dismissal on disciplinary grounds also contribute to reduced capacity of the police. The last population census figures suggest rapid growth and changes in the country’s demographic structure. However, it is apparent that government policy makers have not responded progressively to address the policing needs of a state with rapidly changing demography. For instance, the Kenyan police had a three year recruitment freeze that lasted between 2008 and 2010. The annual recruitment process was resumed again in early 2011. Our research team gathered that the recruitment freeze was instituted to wait for the government to establish a Police Service Commission in line with the recommendations of Ransley Report (The National Taskforce on Police Reforms). This commission will oversee police conditions of service, recruitment and training among others. A new police training curriculum that involved the participation of various stakeholders has been recently completed. Under the new curriculum, police recruits will now train for nine months as opposed to the previous six months while graduate officers will train for 21 months after which they are appointed to the rank of assistant inspector of police. [21] The Kenyan Police Strategic Plan of 2008 - 2012 envisages to have expanded enrolment to possibly meet the UN recommended police - population ratio of 1:450 by 2012.[22] As at the time of writing in the Spring of 2012, the bridging of this capacity deficit was yet to be met.

POOR TERMS AND CONDITIONS OF SERVICE

Dominant opinions of police officers suggest that their terms and condition of service are inadequate. A cross section of police officers interviewed noted that they are not adequately compensated for their services. They also observed that housing is a challenge for junior officers as they are compelled to share living units of two or three bedroom flat accommodation with other families. The police also lack adequate health insurance given the life threatening dangers they are exposed to in their law enforcement duties and fight against crime. The poor conditions of service are also evident in their operational and logistical facilities. They have minimal IT infrastructure and in many instances have to do with manual recordings and filing of information. All these factors contribute to their low morale at work and also predispose many officers to a professional lifestyle of corruption. The majority of police officers interviewed noted that due to their inadequate pay, they are prone to engage in corruption to meet their subsistence shortfalls. The lowest ranked police officer, a constable, earned about Kshs 4,645 (US$60) per month prior to 2004. This was increased in January 2004 to Ksh 10,000 (US$125)[23] In 2009 the Kenyan Internal security minister announced a pay increase for police officers, a process that would be implemented in phases. In the first phase the police would get a 28% pay increase in which a constable would earn Ksh 21,205 (US$265), an additional increase of Ksh 2,400 on their present monthly wage of Ksh 18,805 (US$235)[24] A typical mid-income salary in Kenya would be about Ksh 50,000 (US$600) per month. The category of people that would earn this range of monthly income includes bank clerks and middle-ranking government employees. Corruption in the police force further aggravates the state of insecurity in the country through such tendencies as officers taking bribes to release offenders or to abet such crimes as drug trafficking.

In terms of communication, the police are deficient in a number of ways. The first is that their communication equipments are susceptible to being tapped and in the past, criminal elements have used this sort of subversion to gain access to confidential police communication. The communication gadgets are also highly limited in number relative to the communication needs of officers. The result is that they have in many instances used their mobile phones at their own expense to carry out their official duties. Another issue that many serving officers expressed disenchantment about with regard to their conditions of service is promotion and transfer. Respondents contend that the police promotions and transfers are not handled in a transparent manner. The following excerpts drawn from our fieldwork data are illustrative: and transfer. Respondents contend that the police promotions and transfers are not handled in a transparent manner. The following

Another issue that many serving officers expressed disenchantment about with regard to their conditions of service is promotion. The result is that they have in many instances used their mobile phones at their own expense to carry out their official duties.

In terms of communication, the police are deficient in a number of ways. The first is that their communication equipments are highly susceptible to being tapped and in the past, criminal elements have used this sort of subversion to gain access to confidential police information. The communication gadgets are also highly limited in number relative to the communication needs of officers.

The majority of police officers interviewed noted that due to their inadequate pay, they are prone to engage in corruption to meet their subsistence shortfalls. The lowest ranked police officer, a constable, earned about Kshs 4,645 (US$60) per month prior to the increase in which a constable would earn Ksh 21,205 (US$265), an additional increase of Ksh 2,400 on their present monthly pay. The police also lack adequate health insurance given the life threatening dangers they are exposed to in their law enforcement duties and fight against crime. The poor conditions of service are also evident in their operational and logistical facilities. They have minimal IT infrastructure and in many instances have to do with manual recordings and filing of information.

The Kenyan police are understaffed and therefore the country is under policed. There are estimates that the Kenyan police have a large capacity deficit due to the rapid increase in the population and the criminal elements that have taken advantage. The last population census figures suggest rapid growth and changes in the country's demographic structure. However, it is apparent that government policy makers have not responded progressively to address the policing needs of a state with rapidly changing demography. For instance, the police drivers assigned to top government officials would be more useful in general policing as opposed to their non-essential services carried by the police that would be left out to other government departments. For example, the police force needs some reorganizing of sorts in terms of deployment of officers. There are some categories of people that would earn this range of monthly income includes bank clerks and middle-ranking government employees. A typical mid-income salary in Kenya would be about Ksh 50,000 (US$600) per month.

The national taskforce on police reformation (Ransley Report) has recommended that the Kenyan police have a three year recruitment freeze that lasted between 2008 and 2010. The annual recruitment process was resumed again in early 2011. Our research team gathered that the recruitment freeze was instituted to wait for the government to establish a Police Service Commission in line with the recommendations of Ransley Report (The National Taskforce on Police Reformation). This commission will oversee police conditions of service, recruitment and training among others. A new police training institute to train 2,500 police officers per year has been envisaged to meet the UN recommended police – population ratio of 1:450 by 2012. This was increased in January 2004 to Ksh 10,000 (US$125). The current police force is expected to grow from 58,000 in 2004 to roughly 75,000 in 2012. This will mean that the number of police officers will increase by 29% in the next four years. The KPF has a current authorized strength of 54,000 but their trained strength is still below this authorized strength.

In 2009 the Kenyan Internal Security minister announced a pay increase for police officers, a process that would be implemented in phases. In the first phase the police would get a 28% pay increase from July 2009. This was followed up with another pay increase in January 2010 amounting to 7% and another pay increase in January 2011 amounting to 12%. This was also followed up with another pay increase in January 2012 amounting to 10%.

Human Resource Capacity Deficits

For the police to address their capacity deficits, the police need a comprehensive strategy to address their training and personnel needs. This can begin by addressing the police recruitment freeze in which the police were not allowed to recruit any personnel during these three years. This was due to the recommendation of the Ransley Report. The current police force is expected to grow from 58,000 in 2004 to roughly 75,000 in 2012. This will mean that the number of police officers will increase by 29% in the next four years. The KPF has a current authorized strength of 54,000 but their trained strength is still below this authorized strength.

This is due to the complexity of police recruitment and training. The police training institute at the Police Academy has been operating since 1985 and still serves as the main police training institute in the country. Another police training institute named The National Police Training College (NPTC) was opened in 1994 in the city of Eldoret.

As at the time of writing in the Spring of 2012, the bridging of this capacity deficit was yet to be met. The police service training institute named The National Police Training College (NPTC) has been operating since 1994 in the city of Eldoret. The training that the police undergo at the police training institute is theoretical and not practical. The police also undergo in-service training throughout their career. This training is also theoretical and practical. This means that the police are not getting practical experience during their training and in-service training.

Peace and Conflict Review · Volume 7 Issue 1 · Year 2012 · Page 10
Traditionally, transnational crime has “referred to criminal activities extending into, and violating the laws of two or more countries, not least in Kenya. The disproportionate preoccupation with regime policing in Kenya is reinforced by the fact that the security services (KPF, Administration Police, and General Service unit) accounted for the highest disbursement of public finance. The tension here is that the bureaucratic civilian component of policing seems to be more primarily concerned with regime security (and by extension serve the top echelon of the state apparatuses) with the result that citizen policing and security are substantially compromised. The over-concentration on regime policing is a common phenomenon in most developing countries, not least in Kenya. The disproportionate preoccupation with regime policing in Kenya is reinforced by the fact that the state policing agencies in Kenya are not independent agencies, but are subject to political control and direction under the Office of the President. The Kenyan police force does not have an independent vote in the national budget and receives its allocations from the pool allocated to the Office of the President.

A comparative analysis of the recurrent expenditure in the Office of the President (OP) between 1999 and 2004 revealed that the annual budgetary allocation of the Kenyan police is hardly enough to ensure that they discharge their duties effectively. A cross-section of the interviewed officers alleged that the allocation the police receive is subject to misappropriation by top commanding officers, thereby further impeding their service delivery. A considerable percentage (30% or about 12 KPF interviewees) further argue that in budgeting, priorities are often misplaced and available resources are not utilized in a prudent manner partly because most policy makers and implementers are civilians who may not have the experience of where financial resource allocation are most needed. These sentiments expressed by a section of the police interviewees suggest their willingness to serve the citizens but they seem to be hindered by lack of involvement in budgeting of public finance. The tension here is that the bureaucratic civilian component of policing seems to be more primarily concerned with regime security (and by extension serve the top echelon of the state apparatuses) with the result that citizen policing and security are substantially compromised. The over-concentration on regime policing is a common phenomenon in most developing countries, not least in Kenya. The disproportionate preoccupation with regime policing in Kenya is reinforced by the fact that the state policing agencies in Kenya are not independent agencies, but are subject to political control and direction under the Office of the President. The Kenyan police force does not have an independent vote in the national budget and receives its allocations from the pool allocated to the Office of the President.

Budgetary Deficits

The dominant opinion of police officers interviewed suggests that the annual budgetary allocation of the Kenyan police is hardly enough to ensure that they discharge their duties effectively. A cross-section of the interviewed officers alleged that the allocation the police receive is subject to misappropriation by top commanding officers, thereby further impeding their service delivery. A considerable percentage (30% or about 12 KPF interviewees) further argue that in budgeting, priorities are often misplaced and available resources are not utilized in a prudent manner partly because most policy makers and implementers are civilians who may not have the experience of where financial resource allocation are most needed. These sentiments expressed by a section of the police interviewees suggest their willingness to serve the citizens but they seem to be hindered by lack of involvement in budgeting of public finance. The tension here is that the bureaucratic civilian component of policing seems to be more primarily concerned with regime security (and by extension serve the top echelon of the state apparatuses) with the result that citizen policing and security are substantially compromised. The over-concentration on regime policing is a common phenomenon in most developing countries, not least in Kenya. The disproportionate preoccupation with regime policing in Kenya is reinforced by the fact that the state policing agencies in Kenya are not independent agencies, but are subject to political control and direction under the Office of the President. The Kenyan police force does not have an independent vote in the national budget and receives its allocations from the pool allocated to the Office of the President.

On a general scale, I think the conditions of service are below standards. One, we work a lot beyond the normal 7-8 hour schedule and we are paid little and this hinders our effectiveness. Housing is also a challenge. Police officers at the junior levels live in shared single unit houses, such as a two bedroom flat. We are Kenyan citizens and our private lives should be taken care of; we have children who ought to feel they are decent citizens. A police officer’s child grows up in an environment that has no provision for privacy. Adequate housing should be a priority in the force. We also lack medical and insurance cover for officers and if one is injured in the course of duty, officers or their families are not compensated in good time and this demotivates the force. Some of these issues impact on the way officers do their work and even breeds corruption in the workforce.

Police promotion is in many instances based on nepotism and favoritism. You could be diligent in your duties, perform at the top of your class in a course but you have to ‘know’ someone at the top to push your case. We need a proper promotion scale like in the military where there is consideration, for example, for the number of years an officer has served, among other factors. In the police one could spend 10 years in a particular rank without promotion.

The communication gadgets we use are inadequate and defective. These gadgets work partially ... In towns, such as Nairobi, the police communication can be tapped by criminal elements. These gadgets have in the past been in the hands such as ex-officers who have been sacked. This does compromise on police operations.

Policing Transnational Crimes

Traditionally, transnational crime has “referred to criminal activities extending into, and violating the laws of two or more
Traditionally, transnational crime has referred to criminal activities extending into, and violating the laws of two or more countries, not least in Kenya. The disproportionate preoccupation with regime policing in Kenya is reinforced by the fact that the security services (KPF, Administration Police, and General Service unit) accounted for the highest disbursement of public finance. The tension here is that the bureaucratic civilian component of policing seems to be more primarily concerned with regime security (and by extension serve the top echelon of the state apparatuses) with the result that citizen policing and infrastructural deficits (notably transport and housing) narrated by many of interviewed police respondents.

A comparative analysis of the recurrent expenditure in the Office of the President (OP) between 1999 and 2004 revealed that the pool allocated to the Office of the President.

In a nutshell, it is discernible that the police expenditure on capital development projects is significantly curtailed by other competing demands and emergencies within the OP. The development expenditure approved by the National Assembly for the period from 1999 to 2004 was Ksh 6 billion, while Ksh 517 million went towards capital expenditure. This is far below the budget allocation that was anticipated to actualize the Police Strategic Plan of 2003-2007 as parts of efforts to modernize the force. In the above Strategic Plan, the police envisaged to spend about Ksh 15 billion to facilitate acquisition and rehabilitation of suitable police offices, cells and residential accommodation.

Strategic Plan of 2003-2007 as parts of efforts to modernize the force. In the above Strategic Plan, the police envisaged to spend about Ksh 15 billion to facilitate acquisition and rehabilitation of suitable police offices, cells and residential accommodation.

The inadequate budgetary allocations are further evident in the observed shortcomings of the police force in Nairobi, the police communication can be tapped by criminal elements. These gadgets have in the past been in the wrong hands such as ex-officers who have been sacked. This does compromise on police operations.

The communication gadgets we use are inadequate and defective. These gadgets work partially and this hinders our ability to perform. In towns, such as Nairobi, the police communication can be tapped by criminal elements. These gadgets have in the past been in the wrong hands such as ex-officers who have been sacked. This does compromise on police operations.

A cross-section of the interviewed officers alleged that the allocation the force receives is also subject to misappropriation by top commanding officers, thereby further impeding their service delivery. The dominant opinion of police officers interviewed suggests that the annual budgetary allocation of the Kenyan police is hardly enough to ensure that they discharge their duties effectively. A considerable percentage (30% or about 12 KPF interviewees) further argue that in budgeting, priorities are often misplaced and a section of the interviewed officers suggest their willingness to serve the citizens but they seem to be hindered by lack of involvement in budgeting decisions. They argue that the way they are being treated in budgeting decisions is not reflective of their experience and that of their colleagues who work on the streets. A considerable percentage (30% or about 12 KPF interviewees) further argue that in budgeting, priorities are often misplaced and the way they are being treated in budgeting decisions is not reflective of their experience and that of their colleagues who work on the streets.

A considerable percentage (30% or about 12 KPF interviewees) further argue that in budgeting, priorities are often misplaced and the way they are being treated in budgeting decisions is not reflective of their experience and that of their colleagues who work on the streets. The police interviewees suggest their willingness to serve the citizens but they seem to be hindered by lack of involvement in budgeting decisions. They argue that the way they are being treated in budgeting decisions is not reflective of their experience and that of their colleagues who work on the streets.

The conditions of service are poor. For example, the police work for long hours whereas they are supposed to work for eight hours. The promotion system is not based on merit but on nepotism. There is no health insurance and there is shortage of housing. The police force is also lack medical and insurance cover for officers and if one is injured in the course of duty, officers or their families

In general, the police officers interviewed claim that the police work a lot beyond the normal 7-8 hours. The promotion system is not based on merit but on nepotism. There is no health insurance and there is shortage of housing. The police force is also lack medical and insurance cover for officers and if one is injured in the course of duty, officers or their families

The police communication can be tapped by criminal elements. These gadgets have in the past been in the wrong hands such as ex-officers who have been sacked. This does compromise on police operations.

A cross-section of the interviewed officers alleged that the allocation the force receives is also subject to misappropriation by top commanding officers, thereby further impeding their service delivery.
countries.\textsuperscript{[32]} In recent times, the United Nations in its Convention against Transnational Organized Crime has defined transnational organized crime a bit more broadly to include any criminal activity that is conducted in more than one state but perpetrated in another, or committed in one state where there are spill over effects into neighbouring jurisdictions.\textsuperscript{[33]}

Transnational crimes are not a new phenomenon in modern international history as organized crime groups have existed in the past. Examples include the relations between the Italian and American Mafias since the 1950s, and the smuggling operations by the Chinese triads, among others. Since the 1990s, however, there has been an upsurge in transnational crime globally. A number of reasons have been advanced to explain this state of affairs. Firstly, the proliferation of these crimes can be explained in part by the increased transnational flow of people, goods, and money in the second half of the twentieth century, a process referred to as “globalization” and which has contributed to the growth of both licit and illicit economies operating transnationally. Secondly, the spread of free market economies and democracy in most of the non-western world has contributed to increase in these crimes as a result of their undermining state authority.\textsuperscript{[34]}

A significant number of interviewed police officers observed that policing transnational crimes such as terrorism, money laundering, cybercrimes, banking frauds, and drug trafficking is posing significant multifaceted challenges. On a general scale, there are significant challenges in terms of personnel capacity gaps and operational infrastructure needed to police these crimes. The legal framework of these growing crimes has a couple of challenges mostly with regard to formulation and enforcement of regulatory laws. For instance, on 30th April 2003, the government introduced the suppression of terrorism bill (through Supplement No. 38 of Kenya Gazette). The anti-terrorism bill was abandoned midway as anti-lobbyists of the bill perceived that if enacted, it could be perceived as calculated to stereotype and victimize the Muslim population. Critics of the bill argued that it was a reproduction of the US PATRIOTS Act. Opponents of the bill, such as sections of the civil society organized rallies countrywide to educate Kenyans on the evils of the bill. Indeed, the US and Britain had issued travel advisories to their nationals against visiting Kenya until the anti-terror legislation was enacted. One of the claims made against the bill was that it allowed problematic police searches and extra-judicial actions against suspected terrorists who would have no recourse within the law.\textsuperscript{[35]}

The secrecy concerning the training and equipping of the special units of the police for counter-terrorism operations have in the past heightened the chances of repression and unaccountability by a police largely perceived to be incompetent, corrupt, repressive and alienating the public that it serves.\textsuperscript{[36]} As one interviewed police officer put it, the fight against terrorism is viewed as being discriminatory to the Muslim community in Kenya.\textsuperscript{[37]}

Curbing terrorism is, however, challenging because the Muslim population claim the efforts put in place are discriminatory to them.

Terrorism continues to pose significant challenges to the police. The interviewed Kenyan police officers have “securitized” terrorism as a major threat issue that needs to be addressed urgently. The interviewed police officers perceive terrorism threats as emanating from the lawless state of Somalia that has lacked a central governing authority since the collapse of the Siad Barre regime in 1991. There are striking narratives of interviewed police officers to the effect that terrorist threats abound from the famous Somali-based terrorist group Al-Shabaab said to have clandestine recruitments and training centers in Kenya.\textsuperscript{[38]}

Terrorism is a transnational crime that goes beyond the purview of the state police. It has increasingly become a global problem that requires concerted action by the comity of nations. Kenya has been a target of terror attacks in the past. On August 7th 1998, the US Embassy in Nairobi was attacked in which over 200 lives were lost. Apparently, the anti-terrorism debate in Kenya is dominated by the regional policy agenda of the US government in which the Kenyan government is considered an important ally given the country’s geographical and historical proximity to the Middle East and the Arab world believed in Western security agendas to be the principal source of contemporary international [Islamist] terrorism. Hence, with regard to the Global War on Terror (GWOT) championed by the US government, there appears to be a convergence of interest between the Kenyan state security apparatus and the US foreign policy goals on security.\textsuperscript{[39]} From a purely Kenyan state-centric position, this relationship is arguably beneficial because international cooperation and support may assist the Kenyan state to overcome capacity deficits in terms of policing terrorism. Police officers interviewed, cognizant of the fact that they cannot effectively prosecute the anti-terrorism campaign alone, advocated the need for partnership with international bodies, such as Interpol.

In the Post-9/11 international order, the global war on terror has been waged by the US government and its allies. Increasingly, the US has securitized aid to Kenya by the deployment of their Civil Affairs team to the Muslim-dominated North Eastern Province and Lamu in the Coast Province as a counter-terrorism strategy to secure its interests and those of its allies. The threats are perceived to emanate from several sources. For instance, the North Eastern Province is believed to be a soft underbelly of Al-Qaeda in East Africa. The Lamu area of the Kenyan Coast is perceived as a permissive “ungoverned” area in which terrorists fleeing violent clampdown from the Middle East and North Africa take advantage of weaknesses in the state’s governance capacity to flourish undetected. The other threat emanates from the high levels of social and economic deprivation and grievances among Kenya’s Muslim population, which is believed to make large sections of the youth sympathetic and vulnerable to the course of Islamist militant group.\textsuperscript{[40]} Analysts like Hills, while acknowledging that Kenya is reputed to host Al-Qaeda operatives and sympathizers, further argues that terrorism seems to matter less to the ordinary Kenyans when compared to the high rates of common crime manifested in such incidents as murder, manslaughter, rape, robbery, use of narcotics and the flow of illegal sympathizers, further argues that terrorism seems to matter less to the ordinary Kenyans when compared to the high rates of Islamist militant groups. Kenya's Muslim population, which is believed to make large sections of the youth sympathetic and vulnerable to the course of to flourish undetected. The other threat emanates from the high levels of social and economic deprivation and grievances among fleeing violent clampdown from the Middle East and North Africa take advantage of weaknesses in the state's governance capacity. The Lamu area of the Kenyan Coast is perceived as a permissive "ungoverned" area in which terrorists perceived to emanate from several sources. For instance, the North Eastern Province is believed to be a soft underbelly of and Lamu in the Coast Province as a counter-terrorism strategy to secure its interests and those of its allies. The threats are US has securitized aid to Kenya by the deployment of their Civil Affairs team to the Muslim-dominated North Eastern Province. In recent times, the United Nations in its Convention against Transnational Organized Crime has defined terrorism as a major threat issue that needs to be addressed urgently. The interviewed police officers perceive terrorism threats as arguably beneficial because international cooperation and support may assist the Kenyan state to overcome capacity deficits in terms of policing terrorism. Police officers interviewed, cognizant of the fact that they cannot effectively prosecute the perceptions of terrorism as a transnational crime that goes beyond the purview of the state police. It has increasingly become a global problem and alienating the public that it serves. The secrecy concerning the training and equipping of the special units of the police for counter-terrorism operations have in the past heighted the chances of repression and unaccountability by a police largely perceived to be incompetent, corrupt, repressive and discriminatory to the Muslim community in Kenya: As one interviewed police officer put it, the fight against terrorism is viewed as being discriminatory to them. Curbing terrorism is, however, challenging because the Muslim population claim the efforts put in place are and alienating the public that it serves. The legal framework of these growing crimes has a couple of challenges mostly with regard to formulation and enforcement of disciplinary to the Muslim community in Kenya: while acknowledging that Kenya is reputed to host Al-Qaeda operatives and while acknowledging that Kenya is reputed to host Al-Qaeda operatives and a reproduction of the US PATRIOTS Act. Opponents of the bill, such as sections of the civil society organized rallies countrywide visiting Kenya until the anti-terror legislation was enacted. One of the claims made against the bill was that it allowed problematic critics of the bill argued that it was enacted, it could be perceived as calculated to stereotype and victimize the Muslim population. Critics of the bill argued that it was supplemented in the law. The secrecy concerning the training and equipping of the special units of the police for counter-terrorism operations have in the past heighted the chances of repression and unaccountability by a police largely perceived to be incompetent, corrupt, repressive and discriminatory to the Muslim community in Kenya: while acknowledging that Kenya is reputed to host Al-Qaeda operatives and a reproduction of the US PATRIOTS Act. Opponents of the bill, such as sections of the civil society organized rallies countrywide visiting Kenya until the anti-terror legislation was enacted. One of the claims made against the bill was that it allowed problematic critics of the bill argued that it was enacted, it could be perceived as calculated to stereotype and victimize the Muslim population. Critics of the bill argued that it was supplemented in the law.
common crime manifested in such incidents as murder, manslaughter, rape, robbery, use of narcotics and the flow of illegal weapons.

A cross section of interviewed police officers of various ranks in both Nairobi and Nakuru fieldwork locations allege that terrorist organizations operating from Somali have established a range of secret training bases in Kenya and that this is a challenge to their provision of internal security. The following excerpt from one of our fieldwork respondents is illustrative:

The hub of terrorism in East Africa is Somali and we have in the past heard or gathered intelligence that the recruitment of terrorists and training is done in parts of Eastleigh – a Somali suburb in Nairobi [our emphasis].

Regarding law enforcement, some of the interviewed police officers cited the lack of a comprehensive legislation as an impediment to curbing the growing threat of new crime waves such as those that operate through modern technologies like cyber crimes, identity impersonation and theft, copyright infringements, and so forth. They noted that the Kenya Communications Amendment Act of 2008 in which cyber crimes are defined is not sufficiently comprehensive as there are a number of new crimes that are not covered by the Act. For instance, respondents observed that over the past two years there has been an increase in fraud involving mobile phone money transfer services that is not adequately addressed in the 2008 legislation. Interviewed police officers stress the need to constantly review legislations to make them more responsive to changing crime trends, especially cyber crimes.

According to the International Narcotics Control Strategy report entitled Money Laundering and Financial Crimes 2011, Kenya serves as a major hub for money laundering. The laundering of funds is attributed to Somali piracy, corruption, misuse of casinos, and narcotics proceeds. Further, Kenya’s financial system is said to be laundering over US$100 million each year. The report argues that the unregulated networks of the Hawala money remittances (mostly used by the Somali refugees in the country) are largely untracked by the government.

Drug Trafficking

Interviewed police officers of various ranks in the two fieldwork locations of Nairobi and Nakuru indicate that policing drug trafficking poses significant challenges. Respondents posit that Kenya serves as a transit point of narcotics transported to various quarters of the international market with some finding their way into the local market. The officers cite a number of challenges in addressing the narcotics trade in the country. Whereas the police have a specialized anti-narcotic unit within the Criminal Investigation Department (CID), respondents still point to a number of hurdles. One of the challenges is the fact that the drug traffickers control enormous wealth and are allegedly insulated by top echelons in both the police and the upper levels of government. The following narrative is illustrative:

Drug traffickers have a lot of money and could influence the termination of cases that we investigate if they see significant inroads being made into their territory. There is therefore the issue of interference in our work. Sometimes officers could be prepared to raid a certain place but then they suddenly get orders to stop such a raid. In the past some top leaders in the government have been connected with drug lords and when such crippling orders are given we comply [...] you could be out investigating and a senior police officer intervenes in the case and the consequence could be your immediate transfer to extremely backward areas such as Turkana or North Eastern Province.

The criminal justice system is apparently rendered inefficient in dealing with drug trafficking because of the powerful connections and immense wealth of drug lords, allowing them to easily circumvent the process. Another challenge in addressing drug trafficking offences, as interviewed police officers noted, is with the law itself (the Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances Control Act No. 4 of 1994). Police officers cite the above law as having loopholes, especially with regard to bailing of offences and this implies that police can let go of drug suspects in their custody and who, for obvious reasons, will go underground and never turn up for their pending cases. Yet another challenge is that of operational infrastructure. Police officers interviewed argued for the need to have extra equipment to detect drugs in various ports of entry to mitigate transmittal of drugs. There is also the challenge of keeping up with the constantly evolving criminal devises of drug traffickers. Drug traffickers devise desperate and creative methods that make the detection of drugs difficult. The following narrative of an interviewed police officer tries to capture some of these devises:

Cocaine is for instance carried in a person’s stomach and so it is not easy to detect it unless you suspect that the trafficker has swallowed the wrapped drugs and then you can detain the person somewhere and observe them. Other drugs such as heroine are placed in the interior linings of briefcases and then sealed. Some traffickers put drugs in their shoe soles. Tender babies are also made to carry drugs in their napkins. In that case, it would be embarrassing to undo a child’s napkin to detect the drugs.

In early 2011, the Minister of State in charge of Internal Security and Provincial Administration, Prof George Saitoti, tabled the names of alleged masterminds of high profile drug trafficking in Kenya in the Kenyan Parliament. The suspect’s list included four... names of alleged masterminds of high profile drug trafficking in Kenya in the Kenyan Parliament. The suspect's list included four
In early 2011, the Minister of State in charge of Internal Security and Provincial Administration, Prof George Saitoti, tabled the
some of these devises:
creative methods that make the detection of drugs difficult. The following narrative of an interviewed police officer tries to capture challenge of keeping up with the constantly evolving criminal devises of drug traffickers. Drug traffickers devise desperate and the need to have extra equipment to detect drugs in various ports of entry to mitigate transmittal of drugs. There is also the turn up for their pending cases. Yet another challenge is that of operational infrastructure. Police officers interviewed argued for this implies that police can let go of drug suspects in their custody and who, for obvious reasons, will go underground and never Control Act No. 4 of 1994). Police officers cite the above law as having loopholes, especially with regard to bailing of offences and trafficking offences, as interviewed police officers noted, is with the law itself (the Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances
The criminal justice system is apparently rendered inefficient in dealing with drug trafficking because of the powerful connections organizations operating from Somali have established a range of secret training bases in Kenya and that this is a challenge to their Investigation Department (CID), respondents still point to a number of hurdles. One of the challenges is the fact that the drug addressing the narcotics trade in the country. Whereas the police have a specialized anti-narcotic unit within the Criminal quarters of the international market with some finding their way into the local market. The officers cite a number of challenges in Interviewed police officers of various ranks in the two fieldwork locations of Nairobi and Nakuru indicate that policing drug largely untracked by the government.
argues that the unregulated networks of the and narcotics proceeds. Further, Kenya's financial system is said to be laundering over US$100 million each year. The report According to the International Narcotics Control Strategy report entitled Money Laundering and Financial Crimes 2011

[41]• [42]• [43]• [44]

[our emphasis].'
From the fieldwork interviews, the police believe that many “aliens” such as the Somali refugees participate in crimes such as infrastructure and social service provisions such as schools, health clinics, roads, etc. Their separatist efforts did not succeed but apparently as a result of it, the area was largely neglected in terms of development. Somalis residing in North Eastern Province who wanted self-determination for their region, also known as the Northern Frontier, in 1963, the government of Kenya led by President Jomo Kenyatta waged a vicious battle with segments of the sovereignty in the greater Horn of Africa through their irredentist agitations and campaigns. A few years after Kenya’s independence, the government of Kenya led by President Jomo Kenyatta waged a vicious battle with segments of the Somali of small arms in the country.

Policing Illegal Immigrants

Some of the interviewed police officers contend that refugees have increasingly militarized the society and that they pose significant threats to the stability of the country. Dominant narratives of police officers indicate refugees, especially those from Somalia as key drivers of insecurity in the country due to arms trafficking. The police have thus “securitized” the refugees as constituting key security threats. These arms are said to find their way to Eastleigh suburb, a major hub of economic activities largely dominated by the Somali in the capital city of Nairobi.

Analyzing the case study of Somali refugees in Eastleigh suburb of Nairobi, Murunga critiques the dominant view that Somali refugees are to blame for increased insecurity in the capital city, and argues instead that the proliferation of small arms in the country should be understood in a variety of contexts. He posits that in the intricate arms trafficking business there are crucial factors like the complicity of Kenyan law enforcement agencies, collusion with Kenyan businessmen, and inadequate policing of the Kenya-Somalia border stretching to over 1,000 km. He further argues that part of the reason why illicit arms find their way into Eastleigh is because the suburb is largely chaotic and neglected in terms of social services and public infrastructures (especially roads, drainages, and refuse collection) which inhibits accessibility and aids crime of all sorts in which Kenyans are equally complicit. He also faults the government for failure to address the internal security conditions and the demand for the flow of small arms in the country.

Our fieldwork indicates that arms smuggled into Eastleigh easily find their way to other parts of the city and beyond where robbers use them for various types of violent crime. According to one of the interviewed police officers:

> [...] Eastleigh is just but a base for the smuggled arms. These guns are used to commit crimes; they find their way into areas such as Jericho [This estate is about 7km east of the capital city of Nairobi]. There are many guns in Jericho which is part of our operation areas. Some of these criminals don’t operate from these areas; the areas become the bases for planning their criminal activities.

Our fieldwork data generally indicate that the state’s monopoly of the legitimate use of force is in doubt for a variety of reasons. One of the reasons is the inability of the state to adequately police its long porous borders, especially the border with the failed state of Somalia. This implies that illicit firearms can easily flow into the country. The capacity deficits in terms of state policing personnel indicate that the state security agencies cannot be effective in policing crimes like arms trafficking. The various arms conflicts in the Horn of Africa have left the region awash with small arms and light weapons. Another reason for the inflow of illegal weapons is the logic of local community-driven demand and supply. In Northwestern Kenya, for example, the demand for weapons among the pastoral communities is high and this is attributable to minimal or no provision of state security at all in this volatile region notorious for inter-communal feuds over farm and grazing lands.

Refugee Militarization

According to the interviewed respondents, police officers find it challenging to police illegal immigrants, defined as “aliens” under Kenyan law. The majority of illegal immigrants are from the neighbouring failed state of Somali. The chief enemy of illegal immigrants’ face is the difficulty of differentiating between the Kenyan “Somali” and the “Somali refugees” both of whom are the same ethnic Somalis. The Somalis have often been described as a “transnational state” and have in the past posed a threat to national sovereignties in the greater Horn of Africa through their irredentist agitations and campaigns. A few years after Kenya’s independence in 1963, the government of Kenya led by President Jomo Kenyatta waged a vicious battle with segments of the Somali residing in North Eastern Province who wanted self-determination for their region, also known as the Northern Frontier. Their separatist efforts did not succeed but apparently as a result of it, the area was largely neglected in terms of development infrastructure and of social service provisions such as schools, health clinics, roads, etc. From the fieldwork interviews, the police believe that many “aliens” such as the Somali refugees participate in crimes such as forgery, producing fake identity cards and passports to claim they have “acquired” status of Kenyan citizenship. Contrary to...
Policing Illegal Immigrants

According to the interviewed respondents, police officers find it challenging to police illegal immigrants, defined as "aliens" under Kenyan law. The majority of illegal immigrants are from the neighbouring failed state of Somalia. The major challenge officers' face is a difficulty of differentiating between the Kenyan "Somali" and the "Somali refugees" both of whom are the same ethnic group. The majority of illegal immigrants are from the Somali region due to its proximity to Kenya. An estimated 11,000 Somalis are living in Nairobi, and another 12,500 are scattered in other parts of the country. If we add to this the number of refugees that are on the run, the police officers believe that the country has over 160,000 illegal immigrants. The police are currently involved in a war against illegal immigrants in the greater Horn of Africa. From the fieldwork interviews, the police believe that many "aliens" such as the Somali refugees participate in crimes such as drug trafficking, arms smuggling, and armed robbery.

Somalis residing in North Eastern Province who wanted self-determination for their region, also known as the Northern Frontier, in the 1960s. Their separatist efforts did not succeed but apparently as a result of it, the area was largely neglected in terms of development. Kenya’s government, on the other hand, was more interested in the Somali case in the context of its border with Somalia. It labelled them "Somalis" and effectively assimilated them for the purposes of national security. Hence the "Somali" label was given to the Somali refugees. After the formation of the Somali nation state in 1960, the Somali population of Kenya was left with identity and national security issues. Despite the colonial era efforts to destroy the Somali identity in Kenya, the Somali identity is still strong in Kenya. They are the ones identified as "Somalis" in the national context. The Somalis have often been described as a "transnational state" and have in the past posed a threat to national security.

One of the reasons is the inability of the state to adequately police its long porous borders, especially the border with the failed state of Somalia. This implies that illicit firearms can easily flow into the country. The capacity deficits in terms of state policing in the border areas make the state very vulnerable. The police officers in some of the cases admitted that they were "ill-equipped" to combat threats with the available resources and knowledge. Some of the police officers indicated that the state security agencies were not able to control the inflow of firearms into the country because of limited human and material resources. Its lack of modern and specialized resources to tackle the problem is a major challenge. The police officers also indicated that, in some cases, they were unable to manage complaints and allegations of police brutality because of limited institutional structures at the police station. The state police also have limited resources to deal with complaints of corruption. As a result, the police officers believe that the state security agencies cannot be effective in policing crimes like arms trafficking. The various armed conflicts in the Horn of Africa have left the region awash with small arms and light weapons. Another reason for the inflow of arms is the lack of regulation of the arms trade in the region. The international community has not taken the issue of the arms flow seriously. The state of Somalia is another reason for the inflow of arms into Kenya. The state of Somalia is characterized by minimal state institutions and policies to control the arms flow. Somalia has a very weak state and has failed to control the arms trade in the country. This has made it vulnerable to the arms trade. The state of Somalia has also failed to control the arms trade in the region. The state of Somalia is the biggest source of arms for the region. The arms from Somalia are smuggled into Kenya through the porous border with Somalia. The arms are then transported to the rest of the country.

One of the reasons for the influx of arms into Kenya is the arms smuggling that goes on at Kilindini Harbour. Kilindini Harbour is the main entry point for arms into Kenya. The state of Somalia is characterized by minimal or no provision of state security at all in this volatile region notorious for inter-communal feuds over farm and grazing lands. Weapons among the pastoral communities is high and this is attributable to minimal or no provision of state security at all in this volatile region. The police officers indicated that the arms smuggled into Kilindini Harbour are usually smuggled into the country in large numbers. They indicated that the arms are smuggled into the country in large numbers and then offloaded in other parts of the country. They also indicated that the arms are smuggled into the country in large numbers and then offloaded in other parts of the country. The arms are usually smuggled into the country in large numbers and then offloaded in other parts of the country. They also indicated that the arms are smuggled into the country in large numbers and then offloaded in other parts of the country. The arms are usually smuggled into the country in large numbers and then offloaded in other parts of the country. The arms are usually smuggled into the country in large numbers and then offloaded in other parts of the country.
by extension, use of excessive force in quelling the violence following the December 2007 presidential elections. The police are culpable in acts of extra-judicial killings and, similarly, a Human Rights Watch report released in March 2008 observes that the three branches of the hardly accountable and easily get away with impunity. The violations further have served to widen the gulf and distrust between the police and the citizens. These alleged human rights violations also point to issues of accountability deficits in policing. The policing agencies in Kenya are leadership. This report was compiled between 2007 and 2008, when the human rights body began investigations into complaints of extra-judicial killings in the country, noted that the Kenyan police were culpable in these respects and recommended that action be taken by those that were responsible to safeguard the human rights of all. The second challenge the interviewed police officers pointed out is the issue of corruption and inefficiency both by segments of the police and officials in the judicial and correctional facilities. Inefficiency in the criminal justice system is partly attributed to poor investigative skills and facilities within the police force. Narratives from our fieldwork indicate that crime suspects frequently offer huge sums of money to bribe police officers, thereby influencing them to compromise investigation and have the suspects set free before the time they are expected to be charged to court. Even after conviction by a court of law, suspects or their relatives could bribe the police to have convicted offenders released. By this malpractice, criminal elements are unduly released back to the streets and community to continue their deviant acts. This observation is corroborated by Gimode[55] who argues that the apparent failure of the police and the courts to guarantee justice has in turn led to the culture of mob justice among the citizenry. The public prefer to hand out “justice” by either stoning suspects or burning them to death. “The criminal justice system, argued a female officer, “is not fully efficient because at times they frustrate efforts by the police to have suspects prosecuted in court; the system is compromised by corrupt individuals who use their power and wealth to pay their way out.[56]
The Kenyan police have been repeatedly charged with extra-judicial killings ostensibly perpetrated or aggravated by officers’ frustrations with the ineptitude of the criminal justice system in reining in hardcore violent criminals. Significantly, the United Nations (UN) Special Rapporteur on Human Rights Prof Philip Alston, in his address to the UN Human Rights Council in 2009 on extra-judicial killings in the country, noted that the Kenyan police were culpable in these respects and recommended that action be taken by those that were responsible to safeguard the human rights of all. Prof Alston’s account is corroborated by a report released in 2008 by the Kenya National Commission on Human Rights (KNHCR) entitled The Cry of Blood: Report on Extra-Judicial Killings and Disappearance. The report details evidence of alleged execution of civilians by squads within the Kenyan police force. The report alleges that these killings were sanctioned by both the political leadership and top police leadership. This report was compiled between 2007 and 2008, when the human rights body began investigations into complaints of alleged executions and disappearances of civilians – crimes that were attributed to the Kenyan police. In 2007, the KNHCR had released a preliminary report indicating that the Kenyan police could have been complicit in extra-judicial killings of close to 500 people between June and October 2007 and their bodies deposited in various mortuaries or dumped in forests among other locations[58] These allegations suggest that contemporary policing philosophy has hardly changed. The alleged human rights violations were sanctioned for purposes of regime security.
These alleged human rights violations also point to issues of accountability deficits in policing. The policing agencies in Kenya are hardly accountable and easily get away with impunity. The violations further have served to widen the gulf and distrust between the police and the citizens. Similarly, a Human Rights Watch report released in March 2008 observes that the three branches of the police: the General Service Unit, Kenya Police and the Administration Police were culpable in acts of extra-judicial killings and, the General Service Unit, Kenya Police and the Administration Police were culpable in acts of extra-judicial killings and, similarly, a Human Rights Watch report released in March 2008 observes that the three branches of the police and the citizens. These alleged human rights violations also point to issues of accountability deficits in policing. The policing agencies in Kenya are alleged to have sanctioned for purposes of regime security.

The KNHCR released a preliminary report indicating that the Kenyan police could have been complicit in extra-judicial killings of close to 500 people between June and October 2007 and their bodies deposited in various mortuaries or dumped in forests among other places. The report alleges that these killings were sanctioned by both the political leadership and top police officers in the Kenyan police force. The report further notes that the Kenyan police were involved in alleged executions and disappearances of civilians – crimes that were attributed to the Kenyan police. In 2007, the KNHCR had received a total of 438 complaints related to extra-judicial killings in the country, noted that the Kenyan police were culpable in these respects and recommended that action be taken by those that were responsible to safeguard the human rights of all.

The United Nations (UN) Special Rapporteur on Human Rights Prof Philip Alston, in his address to the UN Human Rights Council in 2009 on the rights and security situation in Kenya, expressed frustration with the ineptitude of the criminal justice system in reining in hardcore violent criminals. Significantly, the United Nations Human Rights Council in 2011 expressed its concern about the lack of accountability and transparency in the criminal justice system in Kenya. The Council noted that serious allegations of human rights violations and torture against citizens passed through the Kenyan criminal justice system, but no one had been held accountable. It was noted that the watchdog function of the judiciary was undermined by the lack of funds, will and independence to speak the truth.

The Kenyan government has since the 1960s attempted to stem the tide of crime and violence. The police have been at the heart of this effort, and the police and officials in the judicial and correctional facilities. Inefficiency in the criminal justice system is also partly attributed to the structural and institutional weaknesses in the institutions that make up the criminal justice system. The police and judicial system are plagued with corruption, inefficiency and a lack of adequate funding. The judiciary is an institution for which there is much frustration over its inability to give justice.

The police are expected to conduct investigations, arrest suspects and present suspects to the court with supporting evidence for prosecution. Interviewed police officers reported that the criminal justice system is in a state of collapse because of inefficient police officers. Inadequate investigation and poor facilities within the police force and courts are the biggest threats to the effective functioning of the criminal justice system. Interviewed police officers reported that the police are frequently offered huge sums of money to bribe police officers, thereby influencing them to compromise investigation and have the suspects set free before the time they are expected to be charged to court. Even after conviction by a court of law, suspects or their relatives could bribe the police to have convicted offenders released. By this malpractice, criminal elements are unduly released back to the streets and community to continue their deviant acts. This observation is corroborated by Gimode who argues that a number of factors are responsible for the influx of Somali refugees into the country. The first is that the Somali refugees are involved in the smuggling of small arms, the second factor is that many of the refugees have Kenyan Somali relatives, which in part contributes to their invisibility once they cross into the Kenyan side of the border. Continuing violent conflict and instances of drought in war-torn Somalia merely exacerbate the outflow of people from the country. Kenya hosts more than one million Somali refugees, a figure that has added a second factor is that many of the refugees have Kenyan Somali relatives, which in part contributes to their invisibility once they cross into the Kenyan side of the border. Continuing violent conflict and instances of drought in war-torn Somalia merely exacerbate the outflow of people from the country. Kenya hosts more than one million Somali refugees, a figure that has added a by extension, use of excessive force in quelling the violence following the December 2007 presidential elections. The police are accused of unwarrantedly using lethal force against unarmed protesters, women and children. The Commission of Inquiry into the Post-Election Violence (CIPEV) Report of 2008 avers that the heavy handedness of police response resulted in the death of 405 persons across the country.

The 2008 CIPEV Report also documents witnesses’ accounts of how the security forces engaged in sexual violations of girls and women at the height of the post-election violence. In the course of their investigations, the Commission (CIPEV) received various accounts of how some security officers (notably KPF) deliberately refused to record sexual violence crimes at their work stations.

Political Interferences

Dominant opinions of the interviewed police and civil society officials indicate that in carrying out their duties, the Kenyan police have been subject to interference by the top political leadership in their work. This is in part explained by the wide ranging powers the executive arm of government, especially the President wielded under the old constitution. Previously, the President had the sole authority to appoint and to dismiss the Police Commissioner who served at his pleasure. This meant in practice that previous office holders had to toe the regime’s line or risk being dismissed. Among other things, political interference, which has not been significantly changed by the promulgation of a new constitution, impairs the rule of law and law enforcement. This is particularly so with cases involving drug trafficking and other high profile crimes. The interviewed police officers argued that they had to toe the line of their superiors or risk far-reaching consequences, including dismissal from work.

Images of Corruption and Laxity in the Police Force

Our fieldwork data indicates that the dominant images the public has of the Kenyan police are those of corruption and laxity. As recurrent subjects of public discourse, the police are associated with such abuses as lax disposition to duty, extortion of common citizens and bribery, extra-judicial killings and collusion with criminals, and human rights violations, among others. Evidently, police officers are not in complete denial of the incidence of institutional corruption and serving officers’ wanton abuse of office, as the following narrative by an interviewed police officer illustrates:

> [...] We have police officers who are less committed to policing duties. Some of these officers have been brought to the force by senior officers or the ruling elite and they essentially regard police work as their last career alternative. Some of these officers are not genuinely committed to professional work ethics and this is a demotivation to the loyal officers committed to their jobs. It is a scenario that hampers the work of the police and therefore means the public do not get adequate services from the police force.

Members of the public interviewed noted that the police may sometimes require to be bribed to take action or respond to distress calls. As one Mathare resident in Nairobi observed, “at times you have to bribe them (the police) to take action and at times they are reluctant to take action immediately when a crime is reported.”

A majority of the interviewed police officers, however, argued that their slow response to crime incidents should be evaluated in the light of their prevailing logistical and operational shortcomings, notably the lack of sufficient infrastructure, such as vehicles. As one interviewed police officer pointed out: “When it comes to transport, it is a very huge challenge. We have one station vehicle that keeps breaking down so often and which hinders our ability to respond to crime situations in a fast and efficient manner.”

Another form of corruption in the police force is that of alleged police collusion with criminals. According to a crime victimization survey carried out in Nairobi city in 2002, respondents had strong perceptions that criminals were increasingly collaborating with law enforcement agencies, thereby deteriorating the delivery of policing services. Similarly, there are claims that the police form part of the chain of traders and other government officials that facilitate the flow of illegal weapons across the Kenyan’s porous borders. A resident of Huruma, a low income area of Nairobi remarked that “the police being corrupt, they at times collude with criminals by hiring out their firearms.”

According to the findings of the East African bribery index conducted by Transparency International Kenya, Transparency International Uganda, and the Tanzania Transparency Forum, the Kenyan police was ranked the most corrupt institution in East Africa in 2009. Dominant interview narratives from members of the public and the civil society indicate that the police institution in Kenya is perceived to be notoriously corrupt. Many respondents mentioned that they often used bribes to access police services.

The interviewed police officers link their bribe taking to a number of factors. The first is inadequate remuneration, which officers said predisposed them to sometimes demand and collect bribes to augment their meagre income. Consequently, the institutionality of corruption often requires that junior police officers on external duties make significant returns from bribes they have collected to their senior line manager and commanding officers. Without such regular returns, a junior officer could be redeployed to a perceptibly unremunerative or remote duty post. The budgetary constraints under which the Kenyan police force operates cannot be over-emphasized. Commenting on the issue, a Nakuru-based civil society official made the following revelation:
over-emphasized. Commenting on the issue, a Nakuru-based civil society official made the following revelation: "The budgetary constraints under which the Kenyan police force operates cannot be perceived as being conducive to ethical policing. The police have often been seen as a disorganized, under resourced, and poorly equipped institution that is ill-equipped to handle the challenges it faces."

The interviewed police officers link their bribe taking to a number of factors. The first is inadequate remuneration, which officers said predisposed them to sometimes demand and collect bribes to augment their meagre income. Consequently, the institutionality of corruption often requires that junior police officers on external duties make significant returns from bribes they have collected to cover their living expenses. As one Mathare resident in Nairobi observed, "at times you have to bribe them (the police) to take action and at times they are reluctant to take action immediately when a crime is reported." Members of the public interviewed noted that the police may sometimes require to be bribed to take action or respond to distress calls. As one interviewed police officer pointed out: "When it comes to transport, it is a very huge challenge. We have one station vehicle which is not functional and the officers have to pay for their fuel."

The police services are reluctant to take action immediately when a crime is reported. As one interviewed police officer explained: "The police are not in complete denial of the incidence of institutional corruption and serving officers' wanton abuse of office, socialization and loyalty to their superiors. This is why the police officers are often reluctant to take action immediately when a crime is reported."

As one interviewed police officer explained: "The police are reluctant to take action immediately when a crime is reported. This is because the police officers are often reluctant to take action immediately when a crime is reported. This is because the police officers are often reluctant to take action immediately when a crime is reported. This is because the police officers are often reluctant to take action immediately when a crime is reported." Members of the public interviewed noted that the police may sometimes require to be bribed to take action or respond to distress calls. As one Mathare resident in Nairobi observed, "at times you have to bribe them (the police) to take action and at times they are reluctant to take action immediately when a crime is reported." Members of the public interviewed noted that the police may sometimes require to be bribed to take action or respond to distress calls. As one Mathare resident in Nairobi observed, "at times you have to bribe them (the police) to take action and at times they are reluctant to take action immediately when a crime is reported." Members of the public interviewed noted that the police may sometimes require to be bribed to take action or respond to distress calls. As one Mathare resident in Nairobi observed, "at times you have to bribe them (the police) to take action and at times they are reluctant to take action immediately when a crime is reported." Members of the public interviewed noted that the police may sometimes require to be bribed to take action or respond to distress calls. As one Mathare resident in Nairobi observed, "at times you have to bribe them (the police) to take action and at times they are reluctant to take action immediately when a crime is reported." Members of the public interviewed noted that the police may sometimes require to be bribed to take action or respond to distress calls. As one Mathare resident in Nairobi observed, "at times you have to bribe them (the police) to take action and at times they are reluctant to take action immediately when a crime is reported." Members of the public interviewed noted that the police may sometimes require to be bribed to take action or respond to distress calls. As one Mathare resident in Nairobi observed, "at times you have to bribe them (the police) to take action and at times they are reluctant to take action immediately when a crime is reported." Members of the public interviewed noted that the police may sometimes require to be bribed to take action or respond to distress calls. As one Mathare resident in Nairobi observed, "at times you have to bribe them (the police) to take action and at times they are reluctant to take action immediately when a crime is reported." Members of the public interviewed noted that the police may sometimes require to be bribed to take action or respond to distress calls. As one Mathare resident in Nairobi observed, "at times you have to bribe them (the police) to take action and at times they are reluctant to take action immediately when a crime is reported." Members of the public interviewed noted that the police may sometimes require to be bribed to take action or respond to distress calls. As one Mathare resident in Nairobi observed, "at times you have to bribe them (the police) to take action and at times they are reluctant to take action immediately when a crime is reported."
The police have problems with transport. A police officer once told me that due to inadequate fuel allocations, they had instances where they would mount roadblocks to extort money for fuel. This case illustrates the infrastructural challenges they operate under.

Bribe taking and extortion by the police is not unique to Kenya. It is a phenomenon that is known to be widespread in the developing world. Elsewhere in Nigeria, for instance, the police often mount illegal toll gates along the highways to extort money from motorists. The modes of extortion used are threats of violence, torture or actual arrests. The approach adopted is the use of junior officers who often have to take part of their proceeds to their seniors, an approach similar to what is reportedly practiced in Kenya. Even the few cases of officers arrested for mounting illegal roadblocks in Nigeria remain largely suppressed and uninvestigated by the police authorities and government. [70]

Difficulties in Managing Ethnic Relations and Violence

The Kenyan police are significantly challenged when it comes to managing ethnic relations and violence. This is in part explained by the nature of divisive politics practised in the country. Ethnic-related violence is more prevalent during election periods (prior to and after elections). This is what Ajulu (terms as “political ethnicity,” which he defines as a “tendency among political elites to mobilize ethnicity for political ends.”[71] Election-related violence is not a new phenomenon in Kenya, as it has been recurrent in the modern history of the nation. The reintroduction of multi-party democracy in 1991 saw the return of ethnic conflicts in the Rift Valley Province. The high level of organization of the clashes, which the state security agencies appeared incapable of surmounting, heightened the speculation about the involvement of the state and some top politicians in the clashes.[72] The 2007/2008 election violence was particularly overwhelming to the police who appeared unable to contain it.[73]

Ethnic conflict in Kenya tends to be exacerbated by the proliferation of militia gangs and vigilantes in the country such as the Taliban, Baghad Boys, Jeshi la Mzee, Mungiki, and Jeshi la Embakasi which some analysts see as a response to youth marginalization by the state.[74] These militia groups, exponents argue, are formed for economic survival and are mobilized around ethnic identities. The other motivation for the rise and mutation of these militia groups has to do with the growing incapacity of the state to provide security. They thus emerge to help fill the security vacuum created by the state’s abdication of its responsibility in security provisioning. These militias operate as ‘shadow states’ in urban slums.[75] As part of their strategies for survival, these militias extort a protection levy from residents of informal settlements in addition to charging for use of illegal water and electricity connections.[76]

Conclusion

It is evident from this study that the KPF faces far-reaching problems and challenges that fundamentally affect the performance capacity of the force. The problems and challenges analyzed in the study are, for the most part, institutional and operational capacity deficits and they altogether encumber the police force in their responsibility of law enforcement and crime control.

Prominent among the observed problematic issues are the unacceptably poor conditions of service and operational facilities within the force. The highly unfavourable terms and conditions of service of the police, as we have observed in the study, should be addressed if the country is to have a modern and efficient police service. There is also the need for the police force to adopt democratic credentials and shift their emphasis from policing for the regime in power to policing for the citizens. This will require a gradual social engineering of the current policing strategy to a more responsive, citizen-centered philosophy. The restructuring should of necessity include wide ranging reforms in training curricula for new entrants and retraining of serving officers. This is a strong challenge because the police in Kenya have, since the colonial days, been used as a tool of oppression and guarantors of regime security. It is envisaged, however, that with the adoption of a new constitution in August of 2010 and the enacting of new reforms proposed by both the constitution and the Kenyan Police Strategic Plan 2003-2007 (Draft 2) will help to address most of the identified problems and also transform the Kenyan police to a modern, professional, and accountable force – a force for public good. Constructive reforms will also help to improve the police-policed relations in the country. Police reforms are presently taking place, albeit at an incredibly slow pace.

Apart from the internal factors and conditions, the protracted conflicts in Somalia have an aggravating impact on Kenya’s security nightmare and the challenges facing the KPF. The proliferation of small arms and light weapons in Kenya is partly as result of the country’s largely unpolicied borders with war-torn Somalia. There is also the correlated dimension of refugee influx and all the associated crimes. This Somali impromptu calls for a concerted regional and an international effort that should, among other things, help to terminate the continuing carnage by warring factions in Somalia, establish a coherent state structure, and prioritize the peaceful repatriation, resettlement and rehabilitation of refugees.

The actions and inactions of the state, as this study observes, are partly to blame for the challenges of state policing. The case of the rise and mutation of militias and vigilantes and which constitute a key security menace is indicative. As our findings indicate the Kenyan state and, by extension, the political elite encouraged the formation of militias in the past to meet partisan political objectives. With time, these militias have acquired a life of their own and operate as ‘shadow states’. The militias have illegally taken over some urban slums in the national capital Nairobi and elsewhere in other peri-urban areas. They run extortion rings... taken over some urban slums in the national capital Nairobi and elsewhere in other peri-urban areas. They run extortion rings objectives. With time, these militias have acquired a life of their own and operate as 'shadow states'. The militias have illegally the Kenyan state and, by extension, the political elite encouraged the formation of militias in the past to meet partisan political The actions and inactions of the state, as this study observes, are partly to blame for the challenges of state policing. The case of peaceful repatriation, resettlement and rehabilitation of refugees.

help to terminate the continuing carnage by warring factions in Somalia, establish a coherent state structure, and prioritize the associated crimes. This Somali imbroglio calls for a concerted regional and an international effort that should, among other things, country's largely unpoliced borders with war-torn Somalia. There is also the correlated dimension of refugee influx and all the good. Constructive reforms will also help to improve the police-policed relations in the country. Police reforms are presently the identified problems and also transform the Kenyan police to a modern, professional, and accountable force – a force for public reforms proposed by both the constitution and the Kenyan Police Strategic Plan 2003-2007 (Draft 2) will help to address most of regime security. It is envisaged, however, that with the adoption of a new constitution in August of 2010 and the enacting of new strong challenge because the police in Kenya have, since the colonial days, been used as a tool of oppression and guarantors of a gradual social engineering of the current policing strategy to a more responsive, citizen-centered philosophy. The restructuring democratic credentials and shift their emphasis from policing for the regime in power to policing for the citizens. This will require addressed if the country is to have a modern and efficient police service. There is also the need for the police force to adopt Prominent among the observed problematic issues are the unacceptably poor conditions of service and operational facilities within the force. The highly unfavourable terms and conditions of service and operational facilities of the police, as we have observed in the study, should be capacity deficits and they altogether encumber the police force in their responsibility of law enforcement and crime control. It is evident from this study that the KPF faces far-reaching problems and challenges that fundamentally affect the performance of the force. The capacity and operational difficulties have been partially addressed through development of the police infrastructure over the years. The capacity problems are also linked to the police culture, which is characterized by demoralization, low morale and poor service delivery. The police culture is partly characterized by corruption, brutality, and human rights violations. Bribe taking and extortion by the police is not unique to Kenya. It is a phenomenon that is known to be widespread in the developing world. Elsewhere in Nigeria, for instance, the police often mount illegal toll gates along the highways to extort money from motorists. The modes of extortion used are threats of violence, torture or actual arrests. The approach adopted is the use of

Apart from the internal factors and conditions, the protracted conflicts in Somalia have an aggravating impact on Kenya's security taking place, albeit at an incredibly slow pace.

Difficulties in Managing Ethnic Relations and Violence

Ethnic conflict in Kenya tends to be exacerbated by the proliferation of militia gangs and vigilantes in the country such as the Taliban, Baghad Boys, Jeshi la Mzee, Mungiki, and Jeshi la Embakasi. These militia groups, exponents argue, are formed for economic survival and are mobilized around connections. Election-related violence is not a new phenomenon in Kenya, as it has been recurrent in Valley Province. The high level of organization of the clashes, which the state security agencies appeared incapable of surmounting, heightened the speculation about the involvement of the state and some top politicians in the clashes.

It is evident from this study that the KPF faces far-reaching problems and challenges that fundamentally affect the performance of the police and their ability to effectively manage ethnic relations and violence. The police are significantly challenged when it comes to managing ethnic relations and violence. This is in part explained by the fact that the police have a limited understanding of ethnic relations and violence and their complexities. The police are also challenged by the lack of resources and capacity to manage ethnic relations and violence. The police are also challenged by the lack of political will and commitment to address ethnic relations and violence. The police are also challenged by the lack of adequate training and skills to manage ethnic relations and violence. The police are also challenged by the lack of adequate funding and resources to manage ethnic relations and violence. The police are also challenged by the lack of adequate structures and systems to manage ethnic relations and violence.

Conclusion
where they charge levies for provision of security, as well as for water and electricity that are connected illegally. One of the fundamental reasons for the thriving of these militia groups is the inability of the state to provide comprehensive security and hence their rise as alternative security providers.

This study observes that the high levels of structural violence in the Kenyan society further complicate the security situation in the country. It is imperative for the state to address human security concerns, such as poverty and the equitable distribution of national resources to ensure a more stable polity. Addressing these concerns would, among other things, minimize the prevalence of militia and vigilante groups that presently constitute key security challenges.

The study also observes a crisis of public confidence in the KPF related to allegations of police engagement in a variety of violations including extortion, torture and extra-judicial killings. The KPF has a great need for confidence-building if they are to win the hearts and minds of public. This study thus recommends greater accountability mechanisms on the part of the police, and stronger oversight by parliament or government in general. There is a need for greater vigilance by civil society and other actors to ensure that the KPF is held to account and that they discharge their duties in a professional way.

References

Daily Nation, “Probe fails to link Kenyan MPs to Drugs,” Daily Nation, 30/01/2011.

Daily Nation, “Team proposes new syllabus as hiring of police set to resume,” Daily Nation, 19/02/11.

where they charge levies for provision of security, as well as for water and electricity that are connected illegally. One of the fundamental reasons for the thriving of these militia groups is the inability of the state to provide comprehensive security and hence their rise as alternative security providers.

This study observes that the high levels of structural violence in the Kenyan society further complicate the security situation in the country. It is imperative for the state to address human security concerns, such as poverty and the equitable distribution of national resources to ensure a more stable polity. Addressing these concerns would, among other things, minimize the prevalence of militia and vigilante groups that presently constitute key security challenges.

The study also observes a crisis of public confidence in the KPF related to allegations of police engagement in a variety of violations including extortion, torture and extra-judicial killings. The KPF has a great need for confidence-building if they are to win the hearts and minds of public. This study thus recommends greater accountability mechanisms on the part of the police, and stronger oversight by parliament or government in general. There is a need for greater vigilance by civil society and other actors to ensure that the KPF is held to account and that they discharge their duties in a professional way.

References

Daily Nation, "Probe fails to link Kenyan MPs to Drugs,'" Daily Nation, 30/01/2011.

Daily Nation, "Team proposes new syllabus as hiring of police set to resume,'" Daily Nation, 19/02/11.

Interview with male Police Sergeant in Nairobi on 18/10/2010. Interview was conducted by a member of the project team.

Daily Nation, “Probe fails to link Kenyan MPs to Drugs,’” Interview with male Police Sergeant in Nairobi on 19/10/2010. Interview was conducted by a member of the project team.

Interview with male Police Chief Inspector in Nairobi on 15/10/2010. Interview was conducted by a member of the project team.

Mark Bradbury and Michael Kleinman, Interview with male Police Chief Inspector in Nairobi on 15/10/2010. Interview was conducted by a member of the project team.

Interview with male Superintendent of Police in Nakuru on 21/10/2010. Interview was conducted by a member of the project team.

Daily Nation, “Team proposes new syllabus as hiring of police set to resume,” Daily Nation, 19/02/11.

Interview with male Police Constable in Nakuru on 21/10/2010. Interview was conducted by a member of the project team.

Interview with female Police Corporal in Nakuru on 21/10/2010. Interview was conducted by a member of the project team.

Interview with male Police Sergeant in Nairobi on 19/10/2010. Interview was conducted by a member of the project team.

Interview with male Police Corporal in Nakuru on 22/10/2010. Interview was conducted by a member of the project team.

Interview with male Police Chief Inspector in Nairobi on 15/10/2010. Interview was conducted by a member of the project team.

Interview with male Superintendent of Police in Nakuru on 21/10/2010. Interview was conducted by a member of the project team.

Daily Nation, “Team proposes new syllabus as hiring of police set to resume,” Daily Nation, 19/02/11.

Interview with male Police Constable in Nakuru on 21/10/2010. Interview was conducted by a member of the project team.

Interview with female Police Corporal in Nakuru on 21/10/2010. Interview was conducted by a member of the project team.

Interview with male Police Sergeant in Nairobi on 19/10/2010. Interview was conducted by a member of the project team.

Interview with male Police Corporal in Nakuru on 22/10/2010. Interview was conducted by a member of the project team.

Interview with male Police Chief Inspector in Nairobi on 15/10/2010. Interview was conducted by a member of the project team.

Interview with male Police Chief Inspector in Nakuru on 21/10/2010. Interview was conducted by a member of the project team.

Interview with male Police Chief Inspector in Nairobi on 15/10/2010. Interview was conducted by a member of the project team.

Interview with male Police Chief Inspector in Nairobi on 15/10/2010. Interview was conducted by a member of the project team.

Interview with male Police Sergeant in Nairobi on 19/10/2010. Interview was conducted by a member of the project team.

Interview with male Police Sergeant in Nairobi on 18/10/2010. Interview was conducted by a member of the project team.

Daily Nation, “Probe fails to link Kenyan MPs to Drugs,” Daily Nation, 30/01/2011.

Ibid.

Interview with male Police Sergeant in Nairobi on 18/10/2010. Interview was conducted by a member of the project team.

54. Interview with female Chief Inspector in Nakuru on 22/10/2010. Interview was conducted by a member of the project team.
56. Interview with female Police Officer in Nakuru on 22/10/2010. Interview was conducted by the member of the project team.
61. Ibid.
62. Interview with female Police Corporal in Nakuru on 21/10/2010. Interview was conducted by a member of the project team.
63. Interview with a male resident of Mathare Nairobi on 23/11/2010. Interview was conducted by a member of the project team.
64. Interview with female Police Constable in Nairobi on 15/10/2010. Interview was conducted by a member of the project team.
67. Interview with male resident of Huruma, Nairobi on 23/11/2010. Interview was conducted by a member of the project team.
69. Interview with a civil society official in Nakuru on 17/12/2010. Interview was conducted by a member of the project team.
72. Ibid.

About the Author

Kenneth Omeje, PhD in Peace Studies from the University of Bradford in England, Professor of International Relations at the United States International University in Nairobi, Kenya and Coordinator of the UK-government’s Development Partnerships in Higher Education (DeIPHE)-funded Capacity-building Project on Conflict and Development Intervention in the African Great Lakes Region.

John Mwangi, MA degree in International Relations from the United States International University (USIU), Nairobi, Kenya.

The authors gratefully acknowledge the United States International University in Nairobi Kenya for funding this empirical research project as part of its 2010 annual faculty research grant competition.

Interview with female Chief Inspector in Nakuru on 22/10/2010. Interview was conducted by a member of the project team.

Interview with female Police Officer in Nakuru on 22/10/2010. Interview was conducted by the member of the project team.

Ibid.

Interview with female Police Corporal in Nakuru on 21/10/2010. Interview was conducted by a member of the project team.

Interview with a male resident of Mathare Nairobi on 23/11/2010. Interview was conducted by a member of the project team.

Interview with female Police Constable in Nairobi on 15/10/2010. Interview was conducted by a member of the project team.

Interview with male resident of Huruma, Nairobi on 23/11/2010. Interview was conducted by a member of the project team.

Interview with a civil society official in Nakuru on 17/12/2010. Interview was conducted by a member of the project team.

Ibid.

About the Author

Kenneth Omeje, PhD in Peace Studies from the University of Bradford in England, Professor of International Relations at the United States International University in Nairobi, Kenya and Coordinator of the UK-government’s Development Partnerships in Higher Education (DelPHE)-funded Capacity-building Project on Conflict and Development Intervention in the African Great Lakes Region.

John Mwangi, MA degree in International Relations from the United States International University (USIU), Nairobi, Kenya.

The authors gratefully acknowledge the United States International University in Nairobi Kenya for funding this empirical research project as part of its 2010 annual faculty research grant competition.